Not illustrated. 1891 Excerpt: .digested food now enters the small intestine, where it gets mixed with the intestinal juice, with the bile from the liver, and with another juice from the pancreas, and these complete the digestive process. The digested food is taken up by little hair-like projections on the inner coat of the intestines, called villi. These villi are full of little tubes--the lacteals--which carry the milkylooking food through a number of glands, and then unite to form one common duct, which passes upwards through the chest and opens into a vein in the neck. The liver, a large Fig. 118.--Diagram of the Circulation. The internal organs of all vertebrate animals are constructed pretty much on the same plan as in man, and they serve similar purposes. As might be expected, however, from his superior intelligence, the brain of man is much larger in proportion to his size than that of any other animal. Fig. 119.--Thorax and Abdomen laid open. The most remarkable variation in birds lies in the organ of respiration. In mammals the respiration is confined to the lungs; birds breathe not only through their lungs, but the air penetrates to every part of the interior of their bodies, even into the cavities of the bones. The lungs are fixed to the back of the thorax, and are comparatively small; their smaller size, however, is more than compensated for by the air-sacs which occupy the greater part of the cavity of the chest. The brains of reptiles...
